Commentary

Global markets rose in March, capping a strong quarter for equities. With economic data continuing to show resilience and even renewed strength, notably in the US, there was growing confidence among investors that a slowdown can be avoided; in fact, there is a developing consensus that a cyclical uplift may be occurring as activity and labour force surveys have picked up momentum. While this is largely a US story, the impact of America on markets and the global economy is such that it has provided good conditions for riskier assets worldwide, even though it reduces the likelihood of meaningful rate cuts from central banks. Coming into 2024, the US Federal Reserve was expected to cut rates in six 0.25% increments this year; while this always looked a lot, current pricing indicates this has been reduced to fewer than three such moves, starting around the middle of the year.

Inflation is still a concern for policymakers. With goods price inflation down to tolerable levels, and showing deflation in some cases, it has been the service sector entirely responsible for slightly above -expectations price data. Labour costs are the key element of this, and with unemployment staying low there has been little sign of further disinflation in this area. The UK picture is illustrative of this; the February CPI figures showed a slowdown to 3.4% in headline inflation, led by food prices, and this is likely to drop further in Q2 due to falling energy costs, but service inflation fell more modestly and sits at 6.1%.

During March, the MSCI World index rose by +3.0% while the broadening of the stock market rally was reflected in relative outperformance of European equities, with the Eurostoxx 50 and FTSE 100 each gaining over +4.0%. All our Equity holdings were positive in March, with the strongest performance coming from our two UK funds, Montanaro UK Income (+3.2%) and Polar UK Value (+4.5%). Our new position in the iShares MSCI Japan ETF (+1.4%) gained in value after being added in the middle of the month. We wanted to have more meaningful exposure to the Japanese market, which is undergoing considerable change in its corporate governance culture which we expect to be a tailwind for performance; we also expect the yen to strengthen from an undervalued position.

Government bond yields declined modestly during the month despite the paring back of rate cut expectations, helping iShares Core Gilts position to add +1.8%, while corporate credit spreads remain tight as demand for bonds has been healthy. As a result, our other Fixed Income holdings all recorded positive returns as well, typically in the range of 1%-2% depending on their allocations and duration (interest rate risk) positioning. We continue to view this area as having good prospects over the coming year. The Alternatives allocation gained +1% in aggregate, with five of the six funds appreciating in value.
